Regulation in the field of telehealth has undergone recent reform. This is primarily because of concerns raised about the use of asynchronous telehealth where there is no real-time interaction with patients. There are certainly a range of benefits of telehealth, but it may not always be appropriate. In this important session we will discuss the full range of issues that telehealth can encapsulate, including:

- The updated Medical Board of Australia "Guidelines for telehealth consultations with patients".
- What circumstances may or may not be covered by MIPS during telehealth consultations including overseas and interstate telehealth.
- Clinical discretion about when telehealth should be used.
